

If any of these remarks appears to be the property of another—stolen thoughts, bastardized theories, plagiarism disguised with a new coat of paint or dressed in a coat of many colors— know that this author lays no claim to such ideas as property but is merely collecting rent on behalf of Blotsplotch.

Blotsplotch perceives itself as disseisor, acting with the color of office, beneath a torch of darkness and a tort of false light. You will notice that the drawings are open and notorious.

(Blotsplotch . . . Blotsplotch only wants
Blotsplotch . . .
Blotsplotch only wants to draw the tightest savoy knot as idiom.)
